THE INTELLIGENCE PROCESS: DEVELOPMENT AND MEASUREMENT OF A CONCEPT

While acknowledged as a widespread business practice, competitive intelligence (CI) remains to be explored as a complex business construct. This paper develops and tests CI as a business process construct revealing multiple phases in the CI process. The paper also discovers that the practice of CI in Canada, while being strong in the area of information collection, is weak from a process and analytical perspective.